Kafka as a figure is elusive, multi-layered and has the potential to be interpreted in a multitude of ways—just like the city of Prague. Though his writing stems from personal, historical experience with the increasing bureaucracy of Prague in the early 1900s, his works have been read in more contexts than he probably could have anticipated in his lifetime (had he even anticipated people ...

In The Student of Prague, Margit's new interest in Balduin creates issues with the man she is supposed to marry. It's here the fear of these movies can be seen. With the role of women growing at the time, it's possible these films represent a fear of chaos being created now that women were leaving their "accepted roles" and taking on new rights and responsibilities.
