Pakistan is a master at irregular warfare, and abhors the Indian-centricity in the South Asian subcontinent. The Pakistan army drives the warrior state and has always been known for "the rationality of the irrational." The past irrational acts of war and the acquisition of strategic and tactical nuclear weapons are examples of this.

The Warrior State: Pakistan in the Contemporary World with T.V. Paul - Conversations with History

The Warrior State is a mentally stimulating and well written account of how Pakistan has become the state it is today. Paul provides evidence for his arguments while maintaining an easy to comprehend dialogue with his readers. I believe the situation in Pakistan would improve significantly if the leaders of Pakistan and the United States were to read and consider his work when drafting future policies and agreements.

Yet, as T.V. Paul observes in The Warrior State, Pakistan, a state that has organized itself principally as a national security state, has failed to develop economically and failed to build a strong state capacity. To explain this paradox, Paul develops an innovative argument that states can suffer from a geostrategic curse, which is akin to what has been termed 'a resource curse.'

The Warrior State: Pakistan in the Contemporary World By T.V. Paul Oxford University Press, 2014. The ability of the state to efficiently provide essential services to its citizens is the marker of a strong state. But since its independence on 14 th August 1947, the state of Pakistan has been struggling to exist as a cohesive unit. Despite overwhelming support from the United States, Saudi Arabia and China in terms of aid, it has continuously faltered in emerging as a powerful South Asian ...
